Sustainable finance and collective management: the AMF publishes a first policy on investor information

Supported by growing investor demand, there has been sharp growth in funds that integrate environmental, social and governance criteria.

While the rapid development of "sustainable" asset management is unquestionably very positive, the ambitious sales pitch on these themes does raise questions as to how to inform investors properly and, more particularly, how to prevent the risk of greenwashing.

Responsible for ensuring that information disclosed to investors is clear, accurate and not misleading, the AMF has published a policy aimed at ensuring the proportionality between the reality of non-financial criteria taken into account in the fund's asset management and the place reserved for this criteria in investor communication. Greater clarity will enhance investor protection at a time when investors are showing growing interest in investments that focus on non-financial criteria.

Funds that wish to emphasise this consideration of non-financial criteria as a central component of their communication or that include it in the fund's name will have to comply with minimum standards set out in this policy and in particular have an approach based on a significant engagement, as defined below.

Funds will have to include measurable objectives for their consideration of non-financial criteria in regulatory documents such as the prospectus. These measurable objectives will have to be significant to ensure a real distinction between the approaches. For the
The AMF may need to clarify its doctrine or adapt it in line with changes in market practices and European legislation, such as the Disclosure Regulation. The regulator is also working on specifying the communication methods of funds that take into account non-financial criteria without making a significant engagement as described in this policy.
